

I am from Indiana, and we already have a very effective law in place that works very well for us. I'm never one to want federal law to override a state's wishes. Perhaps you could set this up as optional, or allow any existining state laws to remain and allow states without similar laws to use this one. Personally I don't see this as an FCC issue at all and wonder why you think you have the power to override a state's law like this. But, if the law allows for you to do this, then you could at least duplicate Indiana's no-call list law and make it a national law rather than make a watered down version such as this one. Despite what phone solicitors will tell you, they should embrace a law like Indiana's no-call list. The list of names and numbers they get from the state are guaranteed to be people who won't buy from them, therefore they can save money on wasted long distance calls. I'm sure they don't see it that way, but they should consider it. Thank you for listening.
